Of late the mother had noticed that her son was becoming more reserved and less talkative. Sometimes he would sit brooding in a room full of people, and seem to see and hear nothing of what was going on about him. He was not popular with the young women of Semerville, who, although they admired his handsome face and bearing, were rather afraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid of him because he was so cold and unstraid her was when they first put on a new suit of clothes. The brown derby hat which Norcross was succustomed to wear and which he had on when he left his home Thursday, Dec. 3, has been found in his office. This explains how he happened to be wearing a slik hat in New York. He probably bought it in Boston just before he left that city.
